

Water

OVERVIEW

Water issues are a paramount consideration for many businesses and public entities throughout the Pacific Northwest. Even the relatively wet west side of the Cascades, water supply is critically important. The winter rains also bring challenges related to water quality, drainage, and wetlands. On the east side of the Cascades, water supply is a preeminent issue for agriculture, cities, developers, and the natural environment.

Jordan Ramis PC is widely recognized as one of the Pacific Northwest's select law firms with a significant water law and water rights practice. Our water law attorneys work with a broad spectrum of clients including landowners, developers, businesses, local governments, and financial institutions who contend with the complex legal environment surrounding state and federal water law matters. Whether we are dealing with Oregon water rights or Washington water rights, our long-established relationships with state and federal water management agencies allow us to effectively advocate for our clients' needs and to develop lasting solutions. When necessary, we also serve as litigation counsel, protecting our clients' water rights interests in proceedings before administrative bodies as well as state and federal courts.
